She will continue to work through the legal and banking procedures necessary to access and transfer BANA's funds.

9.2 Conference Calls: Judy Dixon and Kim Charlson

Judy announced that ACB's conference calling service terminated a few months ago and that BANA now has established a service with AT Conference for 4.5 cents per minute. This has been running $150.00 monthly, but is likely to increase.

GC: Kim will compile a list of free conference call options for those who would be able to use that model, which requires each caller to pay for his or her own long distance charges.

9.3 BANA's Administrative Assistant: Judy Dixon and Joanna Venneri

Judy Dixon introduced Joanna Venneri, who has accepted the volunteer position of Administrative Assistant to the BANA Board. Judy thanked Joanna for her work on previous BANA committees as well as the work she performed in preparing materials for this meeting and for the BANA website.

The group discussed the purpose of the motion form and the file repository and the process for using both.

43 New Business

California test for prospective contract transcribers – California's Clearinghouse for Specialized Media and Translations has proposed a test for prospective contract transcribers. Ann Kelt submitted this for consideration by the BANA Board. After detailed discussion and deliberation, the Board took the following action.

MSC: Jennifer Dunnam moved that in response to the letter from CSMT asking BANA to sanction the California test for prospective transcribers, the Chair of BANA send a letter to CSMT indicating that sanctioning tests is out of the scope of BANA's work. The motion was seconded and passed.

Research in the Rockies – Frances Mary D'Andrea announced the June 2010 Research in the Rockies meeting which will be held in Denver. She encouraged BANA to consider submitting a proposal in response to the call for papers.

Alvarado Code – Judy Dixon referred to the earlier draft that she had distributed to the Board. This document explained the 12-dot Alvarado Code. Concern was expressed that a 12-dot code would result in far too many dot combinations for a person to remember and a cell size so large that it would require vertical scrubbing to be read. No action is requested on this item at this time.

OPEN FORUM
Fall, 2009

Frances Mary D'Andrea, Chair of BANA's Education and Outreach Committee, welcomed all present and explained the structure and activities of BANA. She thanked the Penn-Del chapter of AER for sponsoring the refreshments.

All present introduced themselves. The participants included working and retired teachers, transcribers, and proofreaders; braille readers; and administrators from a school for the blind.

Next Judy Dixon, Chair of BANA, discussed the background of the Nemeth Uniform Braille System (NUBS). BANA has been asked to evaluate this new code, the purpose of which is to combine the literary, math, and computer codes into one system. Some of the differences from current literary braille were discussed: numbers in the lower part of the cell; two modes—narrative and notational mode; some changes in punctuation; some changes in techniques for capitalization etc. Judy walked the group through the handout, and several members of the group read the handout examples aloud. Judy indicated that reading tests and focus groups had been conducted at the NFB and ACB conventions this summer. As a result of the research, Dr. Nemeth is considering changing the colon. There will be more focus groups with transcribers, parents, and teachers at GITWL in November and at NBA in October. One participant felt that consideration should be given to putting number signs in more places so that the braille reader would have an easier time reading the numbers. The example of the equation on the handout raised the question of whether the reader must conceptually understand what an equation is in order to know what the braille means. There will be samplers put out in the coming months, and the code in its entirety is available on the BRL2000 web site.

Next, Frances Mary D'Andrea explained that BANA is working to bring Braille Formats and the Literary Braille code into alignment with one another. Eileen Curran walked the group through the handout examples. There ensued a long discussion of the x used as the times sign versus "by." Should transcribers be changing the material for the braille reader?

Math symbols appear frequently now in standard everyday books. The Literary Committee is trying to decide what to do with such symbols. Other discussion occurred about shifting into and out of Nemeth code. One braille reader said that he regularly receives a computer magazine and finds it challenging to switch in and out of computer code. However, the general feeling of the group was in favor of entering and exiting Nemeth as a method of handling the math symbols. One person asked if the ending Nemeth Code indicator could be the same as the beginning indicator. The response was that making the indicators the same could create ambiguity, but that the question would be passed on to the Literary Committee. These indicators will be included on special symbols pages. The participants in this open forum indicated that they do read the special symbols pages.

Eileen Curran commented that print is changing rapidly, and to keep braille alive, we need a way to represent the print accurately.

A participant wondered why these two systems (NUBS and the literary/formats unification) are being worked on at once – “Who is rooting for what?”

Next, Frances Mary D’Andrea led a discussion of the question of how can BANA best meet the needs of readers in the 21st century with the major changes that have taken place in textbooks and print in general.

What should change about braille?

Comments included:

- The number of classes available to learn braille. Making sure kids are being taught to read and write.
- If the kids are literate and can read braille by 4th grade, then when they are trying to decipher a textbook, they will know enough to figure it out; but the kids need a firm foundation. This is not always happening now.

Q: How about kids with additional disabilities? What about adults learning braille?

- I work a lot with adults. Not enough time is spent on braille in the agency I work for. The teacher is not a braille reader, and she does other things; she cannot read contracted braille. People aren't going to learn enough to worry about all the complicated stuff. I'm talking about older people. One of the hardest things is going into contractions for adults.

Q: Regarding some of these new indicators, do they make braille more difficult or easier to learn?

- Easier if already proficient, but harder if the person is just learning.
- Kids learn to read over a long period of time. Building of fluency is very important. An hour a day is not going to cut it for an adult. Part of the problem is with instruction.

Q: BANA is certainly concerned mostly with code. On code, are there things that would help the learner, or should things stay the way they are.

Discussion of transcribers, and are we losing them? Are they more proofreaders/formatters now?

Q: How many changes would you be willing to absorb to get rid of some of the difficult exceptions?

- I would not be disturbed if NUBS was adopted. It is less confusing than all that stuff we're doing with the literary. (comment from a teacher)

- As a yardstick, we have to think about the fact that computer software is generating braille often these days, and that needs to be considered at least as much as the ease of reading.
- We have to think in ASCII.

Q: Summary: Is it the feeling of this group that there is some need for braille to change?
Yes.

- But the question is how much.
- As someone who has not read print at all, I don't always realize how fast it is changing.
- I had thought, "What do I care what print looks like?" But knowing that children need this makes me think more about it.

Q: What other worries are there about all this?

- There is so much feeling in the world that braille is not necessary, that there are so few of us that we won't win.
- Some teachers saying as long as the kids know the basics, and as long as they have speech, what do I care about braille? It's happening right now.
- How much more now are we listening rather than reading in braille? We can speed the audio up and cover more ground than in braille. We can get magazines much faster in electronic format than in braille.
- The need for the foundation of braille.
- I use braille the same as you use print. I don't use computers that much, and I still use lots of paper. I braille out recipes from the computer.

Q: How is writing done – electronic or hard copy?

- Mostly I use the slate and stylus.
- I have a PacMate at home, but I can't rely on the PacMate. I like writing things on paper because they get done better than on the note taker.
- Kids learning braille have to develop the finger sensitivity and practice for speed.

Frances Mary D'Andrea explained that the Braille Formats book is being re-written, but the work is being done completely by volunteers.

Before the session wrapped up, participants were encouraged to join BANA-Announce to keep up with the latest BANA happenings.
